NWCF Site Visits: Deeper connection. Deeper impact.

Each year, NW Children's Fund receives inquiries from scores of child-serving agencies in search of grant funding. To identify those that will most effectively change the lives of at-risk children, we employ a rigorous and thoughtful grant review process—and personal visits to each grant applicant are at its heart.

Careful review of application materials is an important first step in a grant review, but even the most expertly written proposal can't begin to match the quality of information and the depth of detail gleaned through a face-to-face meeting.

After studying the applications, Board members head out to visit each agency under consideration. They tour the facilities, observe the agency's work in action, and discuss the program's objectives and outcomes directly with those who are delivering the services. NWCF Board members agree: site visits are one of the most educational, revealing, and inspiring parts of the grant-review process.

Recently, Davis and her site-visit partner arrived at an agency with concerns about the applicant's sustainability. "We went in with tough questions about the organization's financial stability. The way the staff addressed our concerns helped us see their strategic thinking at work. They are as determined and resourceful as the families they serve—and our site visit helped reveal this important fact."

Erase your preconceptions.

"I am continually surprised at how mind-opening these visits are for me," Board member Jane Davis explains.

Stay current and connected.

By visiting several applicants every year, NWCF Board members are able to gather insights on the most recent changes and discoveries within our community—from child welfare to social work to brain science.

Being at the center of all this critical information puts NWCF in a truly unique position. NWCF is not just handing out grants, but is becoming a leading voice in child welfare—learning from the agencies they serve; strategically aligning resources, organizations and passionate individuals; and investing donor dollars where they can do the most good.

Gain unparalleled perspective.

Site visits also give Board members a crucial perspective on the diverse array of strategies that organizations are employing to keep children in our communities safe.

“What strikes me with every grant cycle,” Board member Yenii Dex shares, “is how much we all grow as grantmakers by virtue of visiting multiple agencies. We learn what distinguishes one from another and hear how they describe their work. It’s like an intensive course in making an impact.”

Ending the cycle of child abuse and neglect is a complicated endeavor. But the more open we keep the lines of communication—through site visits and NWCF’s thoughtful, honest collaboration with agencies throughout our community—the more successful we are at breaking the cycle, and making hope work.

Site visits: From the grant applicant’s perspective

“Interviews by NWCF Board Members have made the application and award process much richer than any other grantmaking body. Their questions always seem to be insightful and serious and they have often required us to think through some issues more rigorously than we might have otherwise.” Ryther Child Center

“NWCF is a lean and focused community resource. By providing a disciplined, experienced, and researched analysis of the many philanthropic investment opportunities available, NWCF provides a ‘rate of return’ that would otherwise not be available to the donor.” Amara

“The Board of NWCF is a wonderful part of the granting process. They are informed before walking through the door of our agency and do not hesitate to ask difficult questions. These questions are meant to get to the heart of matters, so that a visit from the NWCF Board is educational for the visitors and the agency staff.”
